1 Introduction

1.1 Textiles, garments, fabrics

Figure 1: Most frequently used terms in textiles-related bibliography (English only; LDA topic modeling on a group of twenty papers, mostly published in the 2000s).

- Cloth: «a pliable material made usually by weaving, felting, or knitting natural or synthetic fibers and filaments».¹ However, clothes and clothing refer to «items designed to be worn to cover the body».
 - Textile: «a cloth» (as described above).² In a broader sense, this definition also includes items not used for clothing such as nets or felts.
 - Garment: «an article of clothing».³ Contrary to ‘cloth’, the term specifically refers to an item of apparel.
 - Fabric: «a cloth» (in the same sense of ‘textile’).⁴

¹Merriam-Webster, s.v. cloth, <https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/cloth>.

²Merriam-Webster, s.v. textile, <https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/textile>.

³Merriam-Webster, s.v. garment, <https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/garment>.

⁴Merriam-Webster, s.v. cloth, <https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/fabric>.

«Based on the current state of knowledge, we argue that buying clothing cannot automatically be equated to the purchase of grain or metals in antiquity. Transportation cost is the first major difference since textiles are light (as opposed to metals) and not readily perishable (as opposed to food). The intimate, identity shaping and tactile qualities of textiles and garments make them form a singular category of goods[.] [...] [T]he long production time and complex craft required induce a strong component of trust and personal relationship between producer, seller, buyer and wearer; a quality textile is an item of investment, and the possibility to re-sell it as a second hand product is again more comparable to metals and furniture than to grain, oil or wine.» (Dross-Krüpe and Nosch 2016, 319)

2 Methodology

- data gathering (all documents are extracted from the EbDA database, <http://ebda.cnr.it>);
- pre-processing (removing epigraphic notations, brackets, etc.);
- n -gram extraction;
- selection of relevant n -grams.

2.1 n -grams

An n -gram is a sequence of n elements in a text. The nine-words sentence below comprises seven trigrams:

3.1.1 'a₃-da-um^{tug₂}-I/-II Cloak

Also written 'a₃-da^{tug₂}, 'a₃^{tug₂}. Interpreted as “cloak” or “robe”. The numeral might indicate that it was single (-I) or ‘folded’ (-II). Archi (1999, 311; 1985, 227) also suggested a meaning related to the weaving technique. Etymology may be related to Ug. htl*, “swaddling band; nappy”, from a root characterizing wrapped clothes (Pasquali 1997, 218).

3.1.2 aktum^{tug₂} tunic

“Tunic”; “a long robe or a skirt”.⁵ The aktum was made of sheep fleece, decorated with tufts of wool in the shape of large leaves (kaunakés) (Jones 2007, 223). Women can be among the recipients. Attested in the VE 596 (not glossed).

3.1.3 $ib_2^{tug_2}$ Waistbands

A waistband.⁶ The term ib_2 (lit. “hips”) appears in the VE (867): $ib_2 / ga\text{-}ba\text{-}a$, prob. /qablā(n)/ “the two hips”.⁷ Variously translated as “fascia” or “cintura”. In most cases followed by a numeral between 3 and 6. The scribes described them as “of good quality” (sa_6) and/or “embroidered” (gun_3). The latter is also interpreted as “multicolored”, but see Durand (2013, 21–22) on the meaning of barāmu.

3.2 Woolen cheap cloth, fine textile, waistband

3.2.1 GU.MUG^{tug₂}, woolen cheap cloth

A woolen cheap cloth, perhaps made with wool leftovers. Attested in VE 862 (not glossed). Recipients are of different status.⁸ “An article of clothing certainly very simple, perhaps a kilt, originally made of shoddy wool (mug);”⁹ “‘Wollrest-Faden’-Tücher”.¹⁰ It rarely appears as GU.MUG^{tug₂}-I. Pasquali (2016), drawing from Civil (1984, 85–86), suggests the reading gu-mug^{tug₂} (?).

3.2.2 sal^{tug₂}, fine textile

Uncertain meaning. The term appears in the eš₂-bar-kin_x unilingual compositions (M 15 27, rev.II:3’’). It may be related to Sum. tug₂-sal-la / Akk. raqqatu, “a fine textile” (often mentioned in Old Babylonian documents; see CAD R (1999), s.v. raqqatu A, 167-170).

3.4 Cloak, tunic, belt, sheath, and precious items

3.4.1 GU-ZI-TUM^{tug₂} woolen cloak

Also written GU-ZI^{tug₂}, GU^{tug₂}.¹⁴ A woolen cloth; an Akkadogram possibly related to Akk. kusītum, “an elaborate garment.” Its meaning is certainly related to the root *ksy, “to cover oneself”.

3.4.2 zara₆^{tug₂} tunic

A garment for adults, most often delivered to women. Probably a long tunic, similar to the aktum. Also a gift for brides upon marriage.

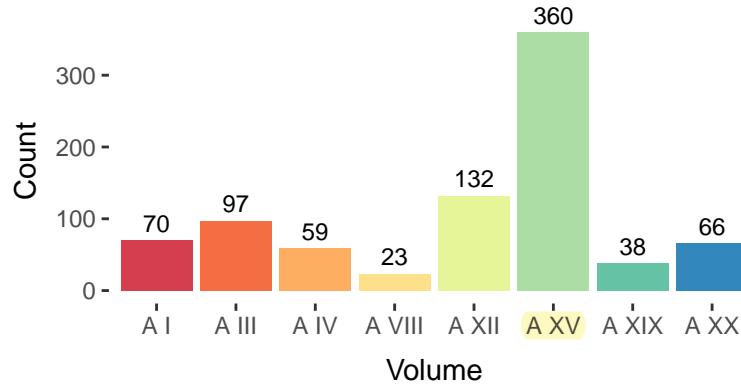

Figure 8: Distribution of the occurrences of the term zara₆ in the administrative corpus.

3.4.3 ib₂-la₂ (ceremonial) belts and si-ti-tum sheaths

Ceremonial belts (ib₂-la₂) are often paired with a sheath (si-ti-tum). As for the latter, Pasquali (2005, 175–76; 2020, 409) suggests a connection with the root sdl*, “to let loose, to lower, to let fall.”¹⁵

3.5.1 tug₂-NI.NI, soft textile

Also written tug₂-NI|NI. The term appears in the unilingual lexical documents (M 15 27, rev.III:31).¹⁶ Uncertain translation. A robe or shawl worn by women and religious personnel. Sallaberger (2009, 270) suggests the reading tug₂-DIG.DIG, "soft cloth" (dig = Akk. narābu, "to become moist, soft"; CAD N [1980], 342).
